The Cuck Cycle, Rightist Unity and White Positivity

tonyodarg.wordpress.com/2020/11/19/cuck-cycle-white-positivity

Tony Odarg November 19, 2020

There is a phenomenon within online dissident spheres that resemble the psychology of abuse victims towards abusers. Here is it explained:

> The “cuck cycle” accurately portrays at least 70% of “dissident” accounts on twitter.
>
> STEP 1: Trump does something profoundly embarrassing or damaging to white people and white interests. We first saw this in 2017 when Trump launched strikes against air bases in Syria, breaking an important campaign promise. Alt right e-celebs like Mike Peinovich and Paul Kersey were furious and vowed never to support Trump ever again. Trump’s apologists went into defense mode.
>
> STEP 2: Trump does something to temporarily white pill the masses. This is always a stupid token gesture like a VERY BASED TWEET, or an empty promise that never materializes. (Key example: Trump promising to designate antifa as a terror group.) These same dorks (who publicly withdrew their support for Trump earlier) are now firmly back on the Trump / MAGA / GOP train. In a cowardly fashion, many of them will delete their earlier tweets to erase any record of their previous disavowal of Trump. TRS did this publicly.
>
> ALTERNATE STEP 2: Some non-whites do something egregious to offend white people (e.g. a Korean bitch at the NYT promoting cruelty toward “old white men”), or blacks riot after a n*g commits suicide by cop. Then the narrative becomes: “Yeah Trump ain’t great, but THE LEFT”.
>
> STEP 3: Online accounts start boosting Trump again, using either fear or disingenuous hope to corral the masses back onto the MAGA train. It’s either “yeah Trump broke some promises, but he’ll be better in the future” or “if you don’t vote GOP, n*groes will rape your kids!” It is not uncommon to see dissident accounts that cycle from 1 to 3 multiple times within a single year – that is, if they manage not to get their accounts suspended. Inconsistency is a stain on any man’s character. It’s a symptom of poor discernment and weak moral resolve. I will unconditionally block any account that I see entertaining the cuck cycle. These types are worse than useless. Trump is like a shitty ex-boyfriend that they never seem to quit (“but BABY, you promised me you’d change!” pimp slap). Not even massive beatings are enough.

The polarization we are currently experiencing at the strong points is around party affiliation. Republicans would rather a black marry their white daughter than a Democrat.

> It is remarked how unified the American Right is right now. There has not been (at least not yet) a post-Trump “crackup” of any kind. I randomly flipped on Sean Hannity on the radio. He’s interviewing Bill O’Reilly (!). They’re saying the same fundamental thing as Alex Jones (just with less bombast). They were even warning of violence if the “truth about the elections” gets out.
>
> Much like the “Boogaloo” movement, they seem to imagine average normie conservatives taking to the streets—or even taking over the government—once the assumed corruption is revealed and the people learn that their sacred election was stolen from them. A lot of this has to do with polarization: party identification has surpassed even race, ethnicity, and religion as a maker or source of personal identity. You’re either on Team Red, or you’re nobody.
>
> But it also derives from a delusion that the American Right will actively cultivate for many years: Trump never lost. This is similar to Hillary supporters blaming Trump’s 2016 win on “the Russians.”
>
> This cultivated delusion will allow the Right to avoid the reality of the situation and not change anything about themselves. It’s a useful, necessary lie, so to speak.

The strategy going into the Trump era by pro-Whites was a disaster, because the electoral map was not properly understood, as Hunter Wallace explains:

> 15% of White Americans are what Jason would describe as White positive. 12% of Americans are Market Skeptic Republicans. These two groups are respectively an even larger share of the right-leaning electorate. Therefore, the solution ISN’T so much a problem of “redpilling” normies as it is a matter of organization. We need to start building our own institutions which are explicitly pro-White and moderate and populist on economics in the Center of the electorate. We tried and failed to pull the Right toward the Center with Trump. They reverted to mainstream conservatism and lost the 2020 election as a result by pandering to legions of imaginary based blacks with cringe programs like the Platinum Plan. We don’t need paleocons standing outside CPAC or Turning Point USA doing livestreams in the parking lot. We don’t need paleocons trying to sell mainstream conservatism to our community. We need to start organizing White positive people in the Center of the electorate who make less than $100,000 a year who agree with our values, beliefs and interests and who aren’t represented by the GOP.

We will never appeal to everyone, but we can organize the right people.

Links

Spencer: https://twitter.com/RichardBSpencer/status/1329183586155593728
Archive: https://archive.vn/L5kBr

Dumpster fire: https://twitter.com/heywildrich/status/1329118543632273408
Archive: https://archive.vn/URPyY

Cuck cycle: https://twitter.com/cashmoneywok/status/1328754276886138880
Archive: https://archive.vn/tucks

White positivity: http://www.occidentaldissent.com/2020/11/18/avoid-the-dissident-right/
Archive: https://archive.vn/Qxjw9